- Di Kupe at its appearance, undoubtedly had a revolutionary impact
- it did not even bemoan "the martyrs" but proclaimed that — they gave off a stink
- this was the courage of a materialist who refused to go to the people ... as the carrier of absolute <sup>national</sup> truths.
- naturalism is then used to emphasize the negation of their ~~total~~ insignificant life and unworthy death.
- but by calling all the gods to the kupe and returning their Torcho to them, Markish was doing a purely literary exercise
- this was not even blasphemy simply because neither Markish nor his readers believe in God any more. Thus the part about struggling with God was primarily theatrical (96)
